FOLLOW-UP: The Chicken and The Egg

May 11, 2023

Which comes first: the chicken or the egg ... or homeopathy?

The way I see it, you can't have eggs without chickens. But sometimes, you can't have chickens without homeopathy!

In last Sunday's blog post, All Creatures Great and Small, I promised to share an impressive chicken story with you. (Well, it was impressive to me anyway.)

Back when I lived in the countryside of Western New York, we had chickens. Our first flock of chickens was of the Araucana breed. This is important to the story because they lay blueish-green eggs. That's all they can lay. They never lay white or beige. Always blueish green. (It was rather entertaining to have ready-made Easter eggs straight from the coop!)

That flock had been with us for a while, so they were getting older, and keep in mind, they only lay eggs for about three years.

One of the chickens had a growth between her legs, around what would be her stomach, and it continued to grow and grow and grow and grow. If I'm being honest, I wasn't paying any attention because the kids took care of the chickens.

One day, my sons ran into the house and said, "MOM! You've got to come look at Gloria! (I think this chicken's name was Gloria, but it's been so long I can't be 100% positive I remember properly. But for our purposes, "Gloria" it is!) Anyway, Gloria's tumor had obviously grown considerably and was worrying my boys.

I just wasn't concerned. I suppose I wasn't thinking about helping the chicken at that point because the whole flock was approaching the end of its egg-laying years. So, (probably a bit too dismissively) I said, "Yeah. Yeah. Yeah. It's okay."

However, one day, I looked out, and Gloria's growth was so massive that the poor thing was actually sitting on it, and her legs were splayed outward! It sounds comical, but neither Gloria nor the boys found it funny.

I don't know what the tumorous growth was. Maybe it was cancer? Maybe it was benign? I just don't know. But I DID know that certain kinds of growths — especially those related to the gut, which is what this looked like to me — have been known to be successfully treated with Arsenicum album.

So, we isolated her and ensured she was fed because she obviously couldn't peck around for herself. With that bulging tumor between her legs, she really couldn't get around at all!

I gave her the Arsenicum every day. It's been so long ago I don't remember the precise potency I used, but my guess is that it was 30C. We administered it by putting it into her water, which the boys changed twice a day. So, she got a fresh batch of aqueous Arsenicum, twice a day.

In short order, indeed, her tumor started to reduce. Over the next few weeks, it continued to go further and further down until it was no longer an issue.

But here's the even more impressive part of the story. In short order (over the next month or two), the rest of the flock stopped laying eggs because of their age. A fox got several of them, and another two died. My friend, I'm telling you ... after a while, the only chicken that remained from that original flock was Gloria!

Yes ... she outlived every one of her flockmates! But not only did Gloria have the greatest longevity of any of the chickens, she even continued to lay eggs well beyond the expected capabilities of her breed. How did we know? The new replacement flock of chickens laid white eggs, yet we would always have a tell-tale bluish-green egg from Gloria.

And it went on like this for years. Now THAT'S impressive, wouldn't you say?

Arsenicum not only did its good work in addressing the tumor but also allowed Gloria to live a long, healthy and stunningly productive life.

These animal cases are compelling when a skeptic argues that homeopathy is merely placebo. Oh, really? Does the placebo effect work on a chicken's psyche? I don't think so!

I'd argue it's proof that homeopathy works!

So, stay Mighty in the knowledge that you have homeopathy for all the creatures you care for, great and small.
